

Enhancing health through environmental quality - opportunities or threats from Brexit

The quality of our environment is increasingly recognised as a major factor in the health of people and communities across the world. In the UK, air quality has now become one of the top public health risk factors, with estimates of over 40,000 deaths brought forward each year by air pollution. Noise, long known as a threat to wellbeing, is now emerging as a direct challenge to health. Policy on land quality aims to prevent harm from industrial contamination as land is developed for human use.

This year marks 60 years since the Clean Air Acts, legislation that tackled the devastating impacts of the great smogs of the 1950's. EPUK campaigned for this legislation (as the National Society for Clean Air), as we continue to push now for robust environmental legislation and programmes to protect human health, in the light of uncertainty around Brexit. EPUK is marking this significant milestone with a look back and a look ahead, to consider the opportunities and challenges for environmental protection from the current situation and the future to provide health protection for all in the UK.

Professor Frank Kelly, Environmental Research Group, Kings College, London, will open the conference with an overview of the current state of health protection from air pollution and what we must do now to deliver real improvements. Dr Jill Meara, Health Protection Agency, will introduce the plenary session by describing the PHE approach to managing health risks from environmental pollution. Graham Jukes, who has recently retired as the Chief Executive of the CIEH, will give a closing presentation on the current and potential future roles of local authorities. Lord Whitty will be introducing a session on environmental protection outside the EU.

In addition to the keynote talks there will be expert presentations in the sessions for each of the main EPUK topics, air quality, land quality and noise. The programme is planned to ensure lively discussion in the conference sessions and many opportunities for networking and viewing the exhibition and displays.

In particular there will be updates on:

- Current issues in environmental health and wellbeing, including opportunities and threats from Brexit
- The Government's revised plans for meeting air quality targets
- Health protection and contaminated land
- Practical issues arising from Government's emphasis in 2016 on releasing land for homes
- Delivering quieter and more tranquil areas for improving urban health and wellbeing
- Opportunities for local authorities and communities in improving the environment and public health

The Conference will be of particular interest to:

- Local authority Environmental Health Practitioners, Contaminated Land, Planning and Transport Officers
- Elected members with an environment brief or interest
- Environmental managers from the private and public sectors
- Environmental businesses and consultants
- Academics and students involved in teaching, research and learning in environmental protection subjects
- Local environmental interest groups
